Spending time with the author, Heather Wolf, in "Sometimes I Leave You in the Dust" makes me feel as if I've been given permission to open the pages of her personal journal and walk with her for a little while. As we travel through the quiet places of her heart, I begin to see more clearly the person she is and the person she is becoming. She welcomes me and accepts me as her friend. There is hypnotic fluidity to her writing and self awareness in her ability to bare her soul. She is mournful, yet hopeful, positive in the face of rejection, yet her spirit soars. She is marooned on the island of mixed emotions, but never loses sight of the bridge to her chosen destination. Most importantly, she has the power to transport the reader to her element, if only for the distance of the journey. I find myself wanting to join her on this trip again.

This book is filled with gorgeous poetry!! I would definitely recommend.
